Estonian National Museum

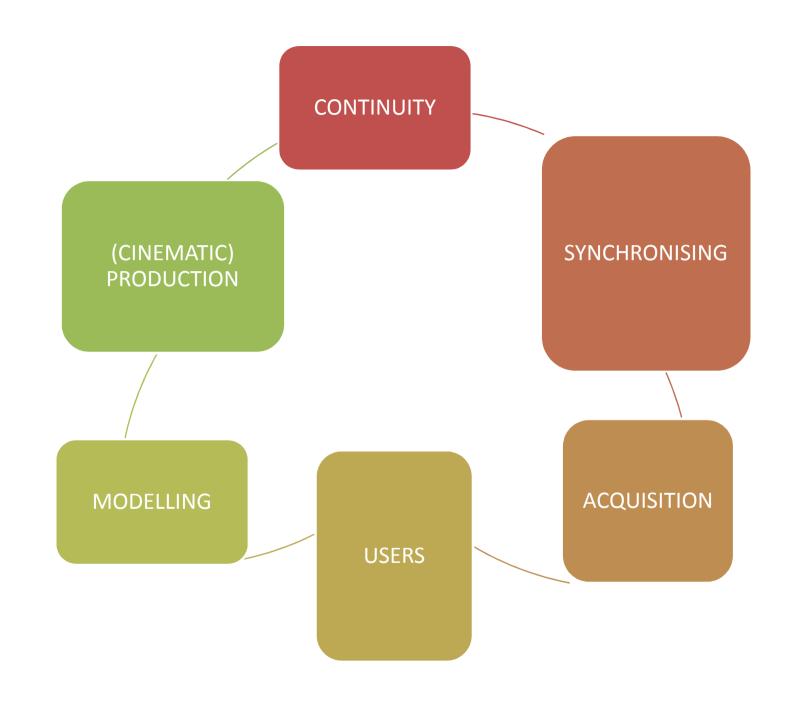

- a museum of ethnography and cultural history, reflecting primarily everyday life of people living in Estonia
- traditional culture of Finno-Ugric peoples
- different archives (artefacts, ethnographic notes, field notes, photos, AV-materials etc)closely connected to each other

Questions, related to the position and role of the AVdocumenting

Emphasis upon film and video documentation

Framework of the existing collection policy

Continuity with the role of existing archive and collecting practices Earlier approaches in ENM:

- focus on material culture
- film and audio recordings as an extraordinary medium in ethnographic recordings (expensive), agency of the proffessionals

Synchronizing collecting policies and strategies with other av-archives and memory institutions

- Is there an AV archive of everyday life and cultural practices?
- Different collection policies in archiving institutions: focus on institutional film production and audiovisual production sector; AV-"field notes" as part of various research paradigms...
- Lack of coordination regarding content, legislation

- Media literacy: usability and content of earlier archives was related to proffesional users (researchers);
- Scope of needs today?
- Produsage as part of contemporary mediated experiences

ENM as content producer

Ways of producing audiovisual documents: Should ENM produce visual anthropology, make films and anthropological cinema (Jay Ruby 2008)? Or should it only collect and store the rushes of video footage from people, video amateurs, as well as selected professional documentary films?

Modelling: ways of producing audiovisual documents

Systematic AV-archive of everyday life (ENM as producer)

Audience as a producer: participatory content production

Research projects, exhibitions etc as triggers for content production (ENM as producer)

Professional production from AV-production sector: documentary film, cooperation with TV etc
